

First lines, like first dates, or the first bite of dessert, can be deceptive.
March 28 – April 26, 2014

Bortolami is pleased to present a three-person exhibition entitled First lines, like first dates, or the first bite of dessert, can be deceptive, organized by Christine Messineo. The title of this exhibition is taken from a text by Ann Beattie in which she discusses the inherent difficulty of beginnings, the first line. Where to start? Beattie nullifies the issue of first impressions by allowing her beginnings to remain elliptical, making the encounter unstable. The reader enters a story mid-conversation, mid-scenario. In this exhibition Ann Veronica Janssens, Kitty Kraus and Daniel Steegmann Mangrané present works where the encounter is not the reveal. First looks cannot be relied upon.

Upon entering the space, one immediately confronts Steegmann Mangrané's sound installation. Seven speakers spaced throughout the gallery in turn produce the sound of one prolonged note played on the flute. The duration of each note corresponds to the lung capacity and stamina of the flautist, Joana Saraiva. As one note comes to its end, another note begins to play from different speaker in the gallery. Mapping the space like sonic radar, the piece creates an analogous relationship between the body and the gallery as vessels of space and breath.

Steegmann Mangrané will also present two series of sculptural works. Several metal chains hang from ceiling to floor, altering the viewer's ability to negotiate the space. Small cardboard sculptures reveal themselves as tromp l'oeil replicas of sycamore tree bark. Their curved shapes cast shadows on the wall, seemingly lending mass to the immaterial.

Janssens's sculpture IPE 130, a steel I-beam, lies on the ground of the gallery. The top of the I-beam has been polished to a highly reflective sheen. When staring down at this piece, this mirror-like surface reflects the ceiling and the architectural supports of the space, alluding to the material's typical usage in architecture. Disque Vert and Magic Mirror Pink continue Janssens study of reflectivity. Each of these pieces, a ruptured reflective surface, highlights a scientific phenomenon or physical property of light—its ability to bend, to refract, to remain encased within a prism-like volume. The familiar forms of a cymbal or a mirror become strange with her subtle intervention.

Kraus's piece Untitled (Light Box) occupies the smaller room in the gallery. Taking the form of a large pedestal, the sculpture casts a strong light from only a thin horizontal aperture that runs around the top of the dark, rectangular volume. The emitted light draws a shadowed line around the perimeter of the room. Drawing out the room's specific peculiarities—corners, the seams when door meets wall, etc.—the piece straddles the line between sculpture and installation, absorbing its surrounding architecture, and even the viewer, into its sculptural field.

For more information, please write to Julia@bortolamigallery.com.